AI Diagnosis and Treatment: Dear Subhradeep Bhaumick, I appreciate your courage in reaching out and sharing your concerns. Let me start by saying that it's completely normal to feel upset or overwhelmed when things don't go as planned, such as not performing well in an examination. However, the feelings you've described – avoiding telling your parents about this failure and struggling with expressing yourself – could be signs of a condition called depression. Depression is a common but serious mood disorder that can affect how you feel, think, and behave. It's not your fault or a sign of weakness; it's just your body's way of responding to stressful situations. I want you to understand that you are not alone, and there are effective treatments available for depression. The good news is that we can work together to help manage these feelings. One treatment option I would like to discuss with you is called Selective Serotonin Reuptake Inhibitors (SSRIs). These are a type of antidepressant medication, such as Fluoxetine or Sertraline, which help to regulate your mood by increasing the levels of a chemical called serotonin in your brain. Another treatment I recommend is Cognitive Behavioral Therapy (CBT). This is a form of psychotherapy that helps you understand and change thought patterns and behaviors that contribute to depression. By learning new ways to cope with difficult situations, you can improve your mood and overall well-being. Lastly, regular exercise has been shown to have a positive impact on people with depression. Physical activity releases chemicals called endorphins that help reduce stress and improve your mood. It doesn't have to be strenuous; even simple activities like walking or cycling can make a difference. Remember, it takes time to feel better, but with consistent effort and support, you can overcome these challenges. I encourage you to take one step at a time, starting by reaching out for help and accepting that there is no shame in seeking treatment for mental health issues. Thank you for entrusting me with your care. I look forward to working together towards a brighter future.
